STUART GRANGER, a wealthy young business man in fear of assassination by a foreign secret society, induces a cousin, who bears a remarkable resemblance to him, to assume his identity. The cousin, little realizing the danger, accepts. That same night the girl leader of the death band climbs in through his bedroom window and attempts to shoot him, but he is too quick for her. Granger's double, with his ready smile and gallant manner, wins over his would-be assassin and bit by bit learns what it is all about. But the death band is determined to kill him even though the girl leader says that he is her sweetheart. A month goes by and the real Granger returns to his mansion only to be trapped by the murderers in his own garden and killed. The doubling cousin tells of his assumption of Granger's identity and the girl who once carried a death warrant for him is compelled to sign a legal contract to abstain from violence until "death do us part."
